

Abengoa receives Provisional Acceptance Certificate for a new electrical installation in Argentina

- The project has included the construction of a new transformer substation as well as the extension of an existing one, and a transmission line for the new Gerdau steel plant.

April 5, 2017 - Abengoa (MCE: ABG/P:SM), the international company that applies innovative technology solutions for sustainability in the energy and environment sectors, has received the Provisional Acceptance Certificate for an electrical installation for a steel plant in the Rosario region of the Santa Fe Province, Argentina.

Abengoa has been responsible for the construction and the installation of a new transformer substation for the new plant owned by Gerdau, the Brazilian Steel company of international reference. The plant is located in Pérez, on the outskirts of Rosario, northeast Argentina. A 7 km (approx.) transmission line has also been built and the corresponding adjustments to the Rosario Este transformer substation have been carried out.

The Provisional Acceptance Certificate from Gerdau confirms that works have been completed correctly.

This successful project strengthens Abengoa's leading position in developing electrical installations all over the world. Abengoa has been present in Argentina for 50 years, and has undertaken major projects in the country in all of the sectors in which it operates, although primarily in the area of power transmission and distribution.
